One Meal for All

Practical Suggestions for Combining Meals for the Child with Meals for the Family

By MARY E. SWEENY*
In collaboration with
MARIETTA EICHELBERGER

FOR THE BEST development and health, every child must be well fed. Every day he must be given foods adapted to his individual needs. He must have foods that supply body warmth and energy for work and play. He must have foods to make him grow. These foods must help develop firm muscles, good red blood, and strong bones and teeth. They must help build resistance to disease and keep all parts of the body in good working condition.

Meals can be planned so that they meet the food needs of the young child as well as those of every other member of the family. It is essential, however, that these meals be attractive, palatable and satisfying so they will be enjoyed by the adults as well as the children.

One meal for all the family saves time in meal planning. It also saves time and labor in food preparation. The practice of serving one meal for the entire family also means that foods can be bought to better advantage. Thus generally a wider variety of foods is possible for the same expenditure of money.

Income, habit, family tradition, and even climate will determine the specific meals served the family. The activities of the various members of the family will also influence the type of meal served.
